“Local Policies and Firm Location: The Role of Leaders’ Promotion Motives in China”, 2023

Abstract: This paper investigates the impact of local policies on firms’ location decisions and the role of leaders’ promotion motives in intensifying policy competition. Local governments compete by offering city-wide policies, such as lowering tax rates, giving subsidies, providing financial support, or loosening environmental regulations. The gap between de facto and de jure policies is non-negligible, and many of these policies remain unobservable due to limited data accessibility. Even with policy data, current literature models local government competition only on one policy dimension (e.g., taxes or subsidies) and overlooks other policies. To address this, I introduce a novel measure to capture the net effects of various policies proposed by local governments. The measure is estimated from a model of firm location decisions and a spatial border design. The findings indicate a tendency for geographically proximate cities in Jiangsu, China to adopt similar industrial policies. Furthermore, this paper presents an innovative framework for understanding local policy competition driven by leaders’ career-advancement incentive systems. Counterfactual exercises demonstrate that leaders with stronger promotion incentives consistently advocate pro-business policies, resulting in increased firm entry into these cities. This study presents the first examination of the consequences of local government competition on firm entry within a developing country context.
