JOB MARKET PAPER

“Local Government Competition and Firms’ Location Decisions: The Role of Leaders’ Promotion Motives”, July 2023

Abstract: This paper investigates the impact of local government competition on firms’ location decisions and the role of leaders’ promotion motives in intensifying such competition. Local governments compete by offering city-wide policies, such as lowering tax rates, giving subsidies, providing financial support, or loosening environmental regulations. The gap between de facto and de jure policies is non-negligible, and many of these policies remain unobservable due to limited data accessibility. Even with policy data, current literature models local government competition only on one policy dimension (e.g., taxes or subsidies) and overlook other policies. To address this, I employ a logit model and incorporate a spatial border design to provide a theoretical foundation for identifying an effective policy measure that captures the net effects of various policies proposed by local governments. The findings indicate a tendency for geographically proximate cities to adopt similar policies. Furthermore, this project presents an innovative framework for understanding local competition driven by leaders’ career-advancement incentive systems. Counterfactual exercises demonstrate that leaders with stronger promotion incentives consistently advocate pro-business policies, resulting in increased firm entry into these cities. This study represents the first examination of the consequences of local government competition on firm entry within a developing country context.
